In education, writing is often distilled into two categories: windows or mirrors. A reader is either given the opportunity to experience a completely different world or immersed in something reflective of their own life.

“Tuesday Night Is HamBingo Night” was the first serious thing I wrote that had nothing to do with me. Until that composition class my first semester at UCF, most of what I read were “mirrors,” and rarely was I in a position to write about anyone with an experience different than my own. As a result, the process was difficult and uncomfortable. But I did it. Partly because I didn’t want to fail Professor Ives’ class, but mostly because the more I trusted the process, the more passionate I became about sharing Carol Lee’s story.

Ultimately, I received a lot of positive feedback on “Tuesday Night Is HamBingo Night,” and one recurring theme stuck out to me: storytelling—factual, fictional, or otherwise—is about making others feel seen.

I enjoy writing but am not normally inclined to share it with others. Even now, I find that I enjoy writing most in a professional or anonymous capacity; however, I am proud of having been published in Stylus and grateful to have been given the tools and experience to share that learning with my own students.

Alissa Warren
Alissa Warren graduated from UCF in 2014 with a degree in English Language Arts Education. She taught English for 2 years in Orlando and the next 3 in Denver, where she now resides. Alissa currently works as Dean of Instruction and IB Coordinator at John F. Kennedy High School.